in both North Carolina and South Carolina. He organized and subsequently served as president of the Greenville Savings Bank in 1887, the Atlantic Bank of Wilmington in 1892, and the Blue Ridge National Bank of Asheville in 1898. He was best known in Greenville as the organizer of the Norwood National Bank in 1907, for which he served as president until 1925 when it was consolidated as part of the South Carolina National Bank. He then served as the bank's chairman of the board of the Greenville branch until 1933. Norwood was involved in numerous other business interests and actively participated in area civic affairs. The Norwood House is a residential landmark and one of the few surviving examples of the Second Empire style in Greenville.
