STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

This is one of a series of sites of outstanding significance that extend through Georgia, South Carolina, and North Carolina. Other related sites are Okmulgee, Irene, and Hollywood in Georgia; the late prehistoric component at Charles Towne, the Santee Mound, and the McDowell Mound in South Carolina; the Town Creek Site in North Carolina and others in all three states. It represents a widespread, late prehistoric Indian culture known by the names of Lamar or Irene, or Pee Dee and dates probably between A.D. 1400 and A.D. 1700.

This particular site is of extreme importance because of its central location in the geographic range of the culture, its exceptionally good state of preservation, and its potential for adding materially to the knowledge of this rather poorly known culture complex. An understanding of this late prehistoric site in this particular area should provide major insights into the protohistoric and historic cultures of the Carolina coastal area as well as the region along the fall line and their relations to the Georgia and North Carolina complexes of the period.
