Describe present and historic physical appearance.

The Roper House is a farming complex located just south of South Carolina Primary Road 11 and Table Rock State Park. Once on farmland, the house, associated landscape features, and outbuildings are sited in a lightly wooded area with cleared fields.

The Roper House is a one-and-one-half story, rectangular plan single family dwelling showing Craftsman influence. The construction of this house occurred in two phases. The original core, built 1856, was enlarged and remodeled to its current appearance in c. 1937. This house, of frame construction with shiplap siding, has a lateral gable roof with composition shingles and a shed roof dormer. The eaves overhang and have exposed rafters and decorative braces.

The primary facade of the Roper House is asymmetrical with four bays. Its one-story shed roof porch stretches across the full facade and wraps to the left elevation. Porch supports are paired and clustered on brick pedestals with concrete caps. The right end bay of the porch is enclosed. The Roper House has single and double windows with double-hung sash windows and bungalow/craftsman geometric glazing. The primary entry is asymmetrically placed. Secondary entries are located in the rear and left elevations. Interior features include pine board sheathing in one of the rooms dating from the 1856 construction and beaded board walls and ceilings from the early twentieth century construction.

The house has a brick foundation, three exterior chimneys and one flue. Each chimney is of different construction. One is brick and dates from the c. 1937 remodeling. The remaining two chimneys date from the nineteenth century. These two chimneys have stone bases (one large cut stone, the other rubble masonry) with brick stacks and corbelled caps.

Three outbuildings, namely a smokehouse, garage, and chicken coop, are associated with the Roper House. The smokehouse is of frame construction on stone piers. It has a rectangular plan, gable roof and vertical plank siding. The early twentieth century garage is also of frame construction. The chicken coop is of frame construction with a

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

This house is significant as an example of Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC) design and also because of its association with CCC activity within the Table Rock State Park area. The house, built in 1856 by the Roper family, was enlarged and remodeled in c. 1937, with the help of workmen from the CCC camps at Table Rock. Some of the stone landscaping was done by the CCC, under the supervision of Doc M. Newton, the stone masonry foreman at the park. The owner of the house, Manning Thomas Roper, was a carpenter and the assistant foreman of all the building construction at the park. Some of the park acreage was obtained from land owned by Roper. Roper provided the land for both CCC camps and also provided the right-of-way for the original park entrance. When the last CCC camp at Table Rock was disbanded, Roper was made caretaker of the park. He was soon after named the game warden for the Table Rock area, and was responsible for selling hunting and fishing licences. Roper later became the first superintendent of Table Rock State Park and served until his death in 1944. Roper's wife, Eva, operated the lodge for several years during World War II.(1)

In 1952, the Roper House became part of the Camp Oolenoy complex, where junior high students from Greenville studied conservation. Camp Oolenoy was founded and directed by Elizabeth Ellison, who lives in the house today.(2)
