DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Situated on an impressive boulevard with handsome government buildings as well as art and music centers, the Horry-Guignard House is an effective reminder of Columbia's origins.

The two story dwelling of rabbit edged siding with hip roof and chimneys toward the center is five bays deep and three bays wide. A slightly sunken basement, reached by a street level entrance, has latticed panels between brick supports. It is covered by a one story balustrated porch the width of the house. The porch, sheltered by a slant roof supported by square columns, has tongue and grove siding. A large single doorway with transom above and sidelights leads to interior. Stairways from each side of the porch lead to the ground level. Shutters, attached with old hardware, on front windows are unusual in that the top half is paneled and the lower half is louvered. Interior has been remodeled for adaptive use.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Horry-Guignard House is significant as being one of the oldest houses in Columbia and as a fine architectural example of Columbia's beginnings in an area which is now a governmental and cultural center.

Built before 1813, probably by Peter Horry - a Colonel in the Revolution and a Brigadier General of the South Carolina Militia. It was later the home of John Gabriel Guignard - Surveyor General of South Carolina from 1798 to 1802 - who laid out the plan for Columbia's streets.

The Horry-Guignard House now serves as headquarters for the Columbia Music Festival.
