Representation in Existing Surveys

Description: First National Bank has a two-story rectangular stone facade with flanking one-story wings. Most prominent features are four monumental three-quarters detached columns separated by five bays with multi-paned windows. Corners of main building feature verticle blocks with projecting pilasters.

Unfluted columns and pilasters are set on a pedestal that extends length of building interrupted by entrances. Columns have plinths, bases and capitals.

Central entrance has architrave, frieze panel, and console supported cornice. Window over door is 7 panes wide and 3 panes high. Windows on either side of entrance are divided into two sections: the lower has 35 panes and the upper 28 panes. Sash is fixed except for small central section with casement.

Between first and second floors are recessed rectangular panels. Above panels is a molding with egg and dart motif. One-story wings on either side of building extend to cornice level.

Significance (continued on back)

Built about 1924, the First National Bank is an excellent example of classical revival design. The massive stone facade is characteristic of bank architecture of the 1920s.

Located on Washington Street directly east of the National Loan and Exchange Bank (Barringer Building), the First National Bank Building was originally constructed as an addition to the National Loan and Exchange.

Following the 1933 closing of United States banks, depositors and stockholders of the National Loan and Exchange Bank organized the First National Bank, Columbia's largest, in 1934.

The structure is currently vacant.

Acreage .23 acre
