Olympia Armory
name of property

Richland County, South Carolina
county and State

The Olympia Armory is a one-story rectangular load-bearing brick building featuring a barrel-vaulted roof, brick parapeted end walls, and intricate brick detailing. The design displays Art Deco and Moderne influences in the corbelled pilasters and window surrounds. The facade is defined by its triple step-down of the parapet. This treatment is present at both the front and rear elevations of the building. This step-down feature allows the center area and middle three bays of the facade to extend higher than the two flanking bays on either side. It also follows the general curvature of the roof, places predominance, and expresses the verticality and strength of the front and rear facades. The three central bays are enhanced by tall metal-frame windows and corbelled pilasters. The brickwork on the pilasters repeats the step-down effect by triple-stepping or corbeling outward in profile and triple-stepping downward in the column's top termination detail. To enhance the vertical effect, brick panels above each window increase the visual elements of the window design. Window panes are utilized with a vertical dimension two-and-one-half times greater than the horizontal dimension.

The Olympia Armory is significant as an excellent example of the National Guard armories designed with Art Deco or Moderne influences and built by the Works Progress Administration (WPA) during the late 1930s and early 1940s.

This armory was built in 1936-37 and was one of several armories designed for the South Carolina National Guard under the direction of Brigadier General James C. Dozier, Adjutant General of South Carolina. Senator W.H. Nicholson, praising General Dozier for making the construction of twenty-four new armories possible during this period, said at the dedication of one such armory, "He is a man who has proved that in times of war there is none braver and in times of peace none finer," further observing that such buildings were dedicated "not to war but to peace."¹

Until 1939, South Carolina possessed only two State-owned armories--one in Columbia, built in 1905, and one in Beaufort, built ca. 1776--opting instead to rent space for the nearly forty other National Guard units around the state. These spaces were usually too small and not well suited for storing military equipment and for conducting training exercises. With the advent of the Works Progress Administration, however, a source to fund state-owned armories of adequate size became available.² By August 1938, 36 communities had requested National Guard units.³ The new armories provided facilities not only for the Guard units, but were also able to support assorted other community activities as well, in large part because they had an open floor space of at least 75' x 100'.⁴ According to General Dozier, the new armories also "served to strengthen already good morale

[among the National Guard units] and a pride of organization is marked in the outfits."⁵

The Olympia armory was built to replace the 1905 armory on Assembly Street and became a center of community activity in the mill villages of Granby and Olympia. It hosted sporting events, theatrical performances, and other civic activities. A stage was part of the original design and the floor was marked for use as a basketball court.⁶ Olympia School, located adjacent to the armory, also utilized it as a gymnasium until the school constructed one for its students' own use.
